Aggressive neuroendocrine carcinoma of the breast is a very rare subtype, accounting for 1.5% of breast cancers. The first case was reported in 1988 by Carson et al. A significant number of cases have been described since this time. It is characterised by a combination of epithelial and neuroendocrine differentiation. Herein, the clinico-pathological data of nine cases diagnosed in our institution are analysed.Q: Firebase realtime database - updating values from Pusher events I have the scenario where a user submits a website to my app, and I need to persist data associated with that website to a realtime database. In the course of this, the data associated with the website changes on the server side, and it's these server changes I need to push up to the users app via realtime database. I have registered my users, and confirmed that data pushed successfully. However, when the website gets changed again, it doesn't seem that the previously pushed data is getting updated. So is it possible to push data to an existing user? Do you need to handle the case of a user existing without being updated? A: If you already have the user, Firebase can't prevent you from updating it. But you will lose the new data that was added when you changed the website after the push. If you can trigger the push, you can do it again on the database to add the data again. Artaud on Theatre ...over the fact that its nothing but theatre. I can't imagine anything worse than a theatre. All that virtuosity, all that "performance", that exaggeration, made so grandiose, so pompous – that's hypocrisy, you see. The true gesture is the gesture of gestures... Yes, but all this virtuosity is only a manner of speaking. Firstly, there are the gestures that are only the gestures of gestures. For example, the gesture of the hand. For example, the gesture of the hand that is only a hand and not the gesture of the same gesture that is the same gesture. There is no resemblance, no similarity at all. It is 570a42141b
