My feeling is that she wrote it with a poor expectation of what would happen to it if it were made into a movie, which it will not be. It is going to be a B/C, B grade, very dull and so on. I do not believe that the author would want this book to be thought of as a literary masterpiece as she seems to be promoting in a number of places, and it is clear that her book is just a call for attention. It's a special day at the Westminster dog show and I'm talking to you all. I would like to congratulate her for having written something that I find entertaining and I hope to see more from her. However, I'm very happy to see that she was given the opportunity to express her ideas on writing, ideas that I hope she continues to try out more and get people to read her work. I've heard a number of people say that they liked the novel, and one person even said that it was fun to read. So if anyone out there is going to read this book and think the same as me, I would like to see someone reply to this review. This is not to say that people who read the novel didn't like it. However, if someone could expand on this by explaining how they liked it, I would be interested to know. Again, it may be what I wrote, but I have nothing against it as long as it's not considered an artistic masterpiece." 0 Nov 14, 2011Rating ReviewsJust what the doctor orderedA book I would recommend that most anyone read is one called Elisabeth's novel, which has been submitted for consideration for the Bradford Book Prize for 2011. The book is written in first-person point of view. It is full

What's new in Fantasy Grounds - Ghoul Island Act 3 Clean Up Crew:

From the planner's perspective, a highway wasn't the only option. A railroad spur line could make the freight train travel on the same stretch of track all the way from Coeymans to New York City. On the same stretch, there was an unused path operated by the city for hikers, and a path operated by the U.S. Park Service for bicyclists. Whether it would be possible to make joint use of those facilities would be a question that would have to be answered. The highway ban was the concrete outcome of a lengthy public debate. The large, group of citizens seemed to have spoken, and the highway commission of the time was duly bound to serve. Yet the public's true desire was not really for a highway. The discussion had been about the light rail line and the spur line. The community wanted still another alternative to the highway or a highway detour. The preference had been for a low-cost, low-hassle, environmentally thoughtful alternative. The way that this desire had been expressed wouldn't make today's environmental crusaders very happy, but it was a good enough fit in 1981 for the state planners. The plans for the light rail spur line had been drawn up; the agency approved, went through its public hearing process, made its decision, and proceeded. Anticipating opposition, it had even set up an underground facility to protect its signal lines against heavy truck traffic. The day after the protests began, federal highway engineers had conducted a bypass analysis, suggesting that the new state highway causeway be used instead of the railroad tracks. But no such permission was given; as stated, the state could go with the tracks. Once the protests began, the idea that some of the locals wanted was forgotten. Quickly, the statesmanlike give-and-take between those who wanted a highway and those who wanted an alternative was gone. There was, of course, a third alternative to a highway. The railroad and parks officials could have said, "Fine, we'll have a railroad line and the right-of-way to go ahead. In exchange, you'll have to keep the forests from being clear-cut and the wetlands preserved." It didn't happen. A railroad spur line didn't have the same fascination value as a highway. In retrospect, we can see that this was a perfect example of the difference between a policy that works and a policy that doesn't. Instead of asking the right question—"what would it take to work?"—we decide first
