(Shades of Les Mis): has been more than a month that the U.S. Army has been testing the feasibility of a new weapons system, named the Soldier Firearm, a weapon that shoots out a stream of thermite pellets at a human target. It's hard to find much information on this weapon, but there is much to be concerned about. Faster, more accurately and simply: The Army is now testing a non-lethal option that fires a spray of tiny, concussive explosions against targets from up to 30 feet away. Called the Soldier Firearm, the Army's first test was a success, with the Army's official test report showing the projectile hit its intended target 18 out of 20 times. According to Wired, the Army has already developed its own “mini-grenade for use by soldiers in the field.” Wired even calls the Soldier Firearm a “homemade grenade launcher.” They should have called it that, rather than saying it’s a “homemade grenades launcher” for the sake of the Army’s propaganda campaign. Later Wired would add that the Soldier Firearm is just the beginning of this new weapon. The Soldier Firearm is an interesting weapon. But before you make an entirely
