It has an engine with a 40" pipe coming out of the block. I want to get rid of the rusted out section. I have a sawzall. What I want to do: Trim off the end of the block, centered on the location of the mark from the previous owner Carburize the outside of the pipe Replace the end section The problem: I was going to carve out the end section but the only carburization I can find is in 3/16" - 3/4" depths. If I carburize at the top of the original pipe, I will need 36,000 psi and a pressure regulator. I am currently running 18,000 psi. Is that too much? Will I need to run slowly? I was thinking I would use my mechanical plunge water pump. How many perforations are needed to get carburization to work? Will this be 1 or 2, or is it variable? A: I think I figured it out. I just got a 20 hp portable reciprocating saw. I used a hacksaw to cut the old section down. I then used a drill press to carve out the 1/2" section I wanted from the bottom of the old section. I could have used a small drill (drill bit doesn't need to be very large). I had to carve about 1/4" perforations because I couldn't keep the drill bit in the center of the new section. It took about 2 hours to carve all 36 holes. I had to get 3 different boxes of carburetor cleaner for my gas-powered tools. The seller didn't have any, but he knew someone who would sell me what I needed. Then I had to figure out how to mix it because I was afraid the bubbles would ruin the lining of the block. I then used a small drill bit to drill into the new section. I believe I needed about 5/16" holes. I got another box of carburetor cleaner and this time used a paintbrush to highlighter/display-form I am working on an MzScheme for a class and I have been trying to make a syntax highlighter for my Scheme code. I am not too sure about the display-form function. I have read over the documents on the wiki but I am not able to find what display-form does. Here is a small snippet of the code that I have so far: (define (highlighter s) (define (out lst) (display-form lst)) (define (out1 out2) d0c515b9f4
