And last I'd like to thank the guys from scenelib that have been helping me with their great software. With their free tool, you can view the source of most of the stills and you can do the same with sound clips in all their variations. And the more I used their tool, the more I fell in love with it. Now that we have a few of these creatures in tow, we can use these virtual moogers to take some sort of mooger-conducted body reading. To get started, we need to use some MoogerFockers. All of the MoogerFockers that we have installed thus far are "virtual," which means that we can use them without de-wiring or hard wiring anything to their motherboards. First off, we had to get some model moogers in the mail (our dear neighbors insisted on keeping the used ones). Next, we had to chose a MoogerFocker. These are found within the MoogerFockers menu, and the Mac version is a little different than that for Windows. This option gives a breakdown of your moogers, including information such as when they were built and how many moogers are present. We chose the 2000moogerFockers because we liked the 60bpm keyboard base and decided that a random display of moogers would not be useful. It is time to turn our virtual moogers into their physical counterparts. To do so, we must first download the moogers in the form of.bin files. The Mac version of the MoogerFockers softwares have the files inside the package, and the.bin files must be opened in the host computer's hard drive.
