CoronaWhomp! is a multiplayer virus game with 13 levels in a linear adventure, with a basic story written by The Godfather of Whomping. I've made it for my own entertainment and to get the artistic process out in the open, but it may also have some therapeutic value for you. The goal of the game is to get through 13 levels and reach the base where your virus is stored, fight off the viruses that defend it, and be victorious! In the most basic form, it is a single player adventure game with a series of puzzles that the player does to progress. If you would prefer, however, you can play with up to four people on the same machine. The game operates much the same way as any "one player" game of the type, where you have a base and you whomp to destroy the viruses in it. The game automatically adjusts from "one player" to "four players" when enough players are connected. The fourth player is a spectator. The game also offers two advanced modes in a move up in difficulty. First is the Pro mode. In this, it's single player, but you have a computer virus to play and a time limit to complete the puzzles. Also, the game will keep track of who is doing the most damage to the base, and the highest scoring person wins. Second is the Team mode. Team mode is two-player simultaneous play. It works pretty much like the team mode on a MMORPG (Massively Multiplayer Online Role Playing Game). If a player dies, the team is suspended until it's repaired. A: It seems your base has been infected. As you can see, the virus has hit multiple points. You should probably leave town before they sabotage your base permanently. Chikungunya: Challenges and Potential for Malaria Control in Africa. Chikungunya has been in the spotlight since its detection in East Africa in late 2005, as an epidemic from then on has been reported from many African countries, almost yearly, over the past 10 years. Currently, the World Health Organization has included chikungunya on the list of countries that can suffer from outbreaks of neglected tropical diseases. As malaria elimination becomes a realistic goal in many African countries, greater attention needs to be devoted to this co-circulating arbovirus. Evaluating the epidemiological, clinical, and environmental data of chikungunya transmission shows how much the current malaria control tools are

The investigation is into staff who have been allowed to fly transport planes after qualifying just for cabin crew. Mr Neville Staple, chief operating officer at Channel 5 said they will expose the 'dangerous' aviation industry in a lengthy film tonight. Many of the people who work on the front line of the UK airline industry have talked to the programme and told of the shocking abuse they faced. Among those hurtled to a safe landing yesterday at Croydon, was a deaf services crew, Tracey Booth and Charlotte Baybutt. Tracey, 39, and Charlotte, 25, from South Wales were on duty aboard the Nordic Spirit bound for Brussels. The two and seven others from the Channel Islands kept to themselves. The pair worked on a watch-for-any-hazards crew and were due to help prepare the runway for the plane's arrival at Heathrow. But when it was approaching Croydon, pilots made an emergency landing - using the only assistant stoker, Charlotte. The safety crew on the Norwegian plane told terrified crew and passengers they were landing from Bristol Airport to collect three people in Southampton. Charlotte Baybutt (left) and Tracey Booth (right) suffered the horrific consequences of their team members pulling out of the flight - when they were too ill to help But after the plane taxied to a standstill on the runway, the aircraft started to fill up with fumes. Seconds before the main door was due to open to let the passengers out, the crew grabbed a fire extinguisher and began smothering the burning plane. No one was on fire, but the first sign of a huge problem. Charlotte turned to the seated passengers, pointed at them as she announced: 'Normally we warn you about
