In-plane axisymmetric optical cavity for the dynamic probing of interfacial and rheological properties of tissue. We describe a novel ultrahigh sensitive method to characterize both bulk and interfacial properties of biological tissues via the use of a 3D axisymmetric cavity. The cavity is based on the axial transverse diffraction theory of light interacting with a rectangular array of cylindrical optical fibers applied to a rotational-symmetric cavity. Changes in the fiber array and membrane properties are detected using a laser beam in a single-shot fashion. The present invention relates to the design of a printed circuit board connector having two-way termination capability. More particularly, the present invention relates to the design of a connector containing a single planar array of electrical contacts that can be disconnected in one manner and that is capable of being terminated in both planar array and vertical spaced parallel arrangement. In the electronics industry there is an increasing use of printed circuit boards (PCB's). These boards have a pattern of electrical connections thereon in a generally two-dimensional array. Frequently, the electrical connections are made to one or more integrated circuit chips or other electrical devices that are mounted on one or both surfaces of the PCB's. In addition, the electrical connections must be provided to various devices that are separate from the PCB's. For example, the electrical connections must be provided to diodes, resistors, connectors, capacitors, and the like. A first method of providing the electrical connections for the PCB's is by positioning the electrical contacts that make up the circuitry on either side of the PCB's. Such an arrangement is illustrated in the prior art FIG. 1. Electrical contacts, designated with the reference numerals 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, are positioned on a first surface 26 of a PCB 25 and spaced apart from one another. Contact 20 is connected to electrical circuitry located on surface 26 and is connected to electrical contact 21 via a leg 29 extending across the PCB. Electrical contact 22 is connected to electrical circuitry located on surface 26 and is connected to electrical contact 23 via a similar leg extending across the PCB. Further, electrical contact 24 is

Studies on the role of annexins in cell-to-cell adhesion and cell-matrix adhesion are reviewed with particular focus on the structures involved in these processes. Expression of annexin II (Anx II) is associated with invasive and/or metastatic capacities of a number of tumor types. Anx II is expressed in the invasive and metastatic cells, and not in normal cells. The N-terminal head-group of Anx II is known to be critical for the local organization of the phospholipid plasma membrane, and a head-group modification affects growth and survival of tumor cells. A recent biochemical study has demonstrated the presence of membrane bound calcium directly by Anx II. These findings suggest that a modification of the Anx II head-group can function as a novel mechanism modulating cell-matrix adhesion as well as cell-cell adhesion. These findings further suggest that Anx II might be an independent variable for the attachment and growth of tumor cells. The other members of the family of annexins, Anx I and V, have a distinct distribution pattern in the cell, suggesting that the functions of Anx I and V may be different from those of Anx II in cell-cell or cell-matrix interactions. This article will update the knowledge of the structure-function relationship of annexins. According to the Tacoma News-Tribune's Sheil Kapadia, Carroll said he expects the second overall pick in 2017 to leave Seattle for free agency in March. One of the main reasons Carroll believes McD
