You should probably not wait until something happens to your computer before creating a backup copy of your information, but it's a good idea to back up files, folders and even the Windows operating system periodically. If you are a Windows user and this is the first time you are hearing about such a software, Portable Apps Backup is a tool that will enable you to create backup copies of your files, folders and entire hard drive. This type of software is highly recommended to protect the integrity of your information, in case something were to happen to your computer, such as Windows or the hard drive crashing. Since installation is not necessary, you can store Portable Apps Backup on an external device (like a USB flash drive), save it to any computer and directly run its executable file. This way, you can carry Portable Apps Backup with you when you're on the go. Plus, the Windows registry does not receive new entries and no files are left behind after removing the program. The interface of the utility is based on a wizard where you can follow several simple steps to get the job done; you can get started by selecting the type of items you want to back up, between 'Complete' (all files on your portable drive), 'App Data' (app settings, profiles, bookmarks and others) and 'Documents' (the documents directory on your portable drive). In the following steps, you can establish the target location for the backup and configure settings, such as making the tool use the 7z format and displaying backup details, as well as enabling maximum compression mode (which is slower but more efficient). Restoring backups can be easily done by accessing a separate Portable Apps Backup executable file. The program takes a reasonable amount of time to create backup copies, depending on the size of the selected files, directory or volume. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a word splitting method in a text retrieval system and method for converting a text search program into a word split program. 2. Description of the Related Art Conventionally, when a search is executed in a text retrieval system, a word is usually separated into syllables and then a search is performed on each word. For example, in the case where a person search, the person name is first split into words such as "person", "Japan", "guys" and the like, and then each word is searched for the person name. In this process, in order to accurately identify the data which the user requires, the process for an improved search should be performed in consideration of various human factors. For example, in the case where a "guys" is used as a search word, it is clear that it is not absolutely necessary to search "guys" alone, but it is important to search a particular "guys" such as "Japan". Even though the word split function is established in the system, in many cases, the function has not been effectively utilized due to various reasons. This is because there is no evaluation method to determine whether or not each word of the search word should be correctly split. Further, in the case where the document includes a lot of non-words, it is difficult to effectively utilize the feature of word split. In addition, the amount of text which requires a word split operation is increasing with an increase in the volume of the document. Thus, not only the amount of apparatus needed but also the processing time also increase.Q: Fatal error: Using $this when not in object context This is my code: class A{ protected $id; protected $owner;
